SUGAR BY ELECTRICITY.

The Philadelphia Record prints the following interesting account of an alleged perfecting of a method of refining raw sugar by electricity. Sugar merchants and brokers all over the country are in a flurry at the announcement recently made to the effect that the much-mooted process of refining raw sugar by aid of electricity had been brought to a consummation, and that by the middle of next month a refinery using this process exclusively would be in operation. It is said that a party of English and American capitalists, representing at least $15,000,000, is now prepared to erect electric refineries in all the principal cities on both continents, if the process should be proved to be successful by the 10th of October. If the scheme is all right it will cause a revolution in sugar refining that will mark an important era in the history of that article of commerce. This system is, however, the same that has been in process of completion for the last ten or fifteen years, and it is the same that has so repeatedly failed in accomplishing its purpose that the faith of those who at one time believed in its ultimate success was so frequently shocked as to create a prejudice against it and eventually secure the condemnation and arouse the incredulity of its erstwhile advocates. Of late years an almost universal opinion, declaring the system to be unpracticable, has been in existence, and nothing short of a thorough exposition of the system and its principles will restore the faith of men in the sugar trade. This, it is claimed, has been given; but it was satisfactory only to a degree. In a refinery in Brooklyn a few days ago a quantity of raw sugar was refined in the presence of a party of gentlemen interested in the process. Thirteen barrels of the raw material were refined at the recent test. The raw sugar was put into a receiver, from which it passed through two secret rooms containing the machinery before being run into barrels in a refined state. What the machinery is no one apparently except the inventor seems to know. The raw sugar goes into the receiver, and once it leaves that simple place of mechanism it is not seen again until it finds its way out through a chute at the further end of the two mysterious machinery rooms. During the time the machinery was in operation (twenty-five minutes) the refined article was turned out at the rate of one barrel for every two minutes. The process of refining is claimed to be perfectly dry, and it certainly must be, for when it came through it was dryer than the raw sugar, and the crystals were absolutely perfect. The promoters of the scheme say it will turn out sugar in ten different grades, the only alterations in the machinery necessary being the changing of the plates in the granulators.
